Behind the Line

THE KGB OFFICER was waiting for him when John Barron, delayed in traffic, arrived at home on a dark, rainy night in November 1979. Stanislav Levchenko rose as Barron entered the room, and for a moment the two stood, assessing each other. "We are proud that you are among us," Barron said, in Russian.

Sitting by the fire, Barron, a Reader's Digest Senior Editor, and Levchenko, who had defected from the KGB in Tokyo, began to develop what was to be a deep friendship.
